

Please use to "maggie" and then carry on with the story in the same detail.

(interesting word choice)

(fronted adverbial)

Without faltering, the beam of the light flashed brightly across the dark night sky, exposing the jagged rocks and hidden dangers that lurked within the bay and the sloping

(expanded noun phrase)

tilled roofs and narrow alleyways of the small fishing village, nestled within the cove.

(replaces and) (;)

The flash of light from high above them was part of everyday life for the villagers; and the children could sleep soundly in their beds, never knowing the fear of the dark, which troubles infants all over the world.

(modal verb)

(New time)

(passive voice)

On this night though their peaceful slumber was broken by the sound of a strong wind whistling through the empty streets and the raucous singing laughter and merriment of the men, who had returned to shore that evening, relieved to have reached the safety of home before the storm broke.

(relative clause)

(overuse of village)

The sound of the men's laughter echoed through the village and travelled through the night air, high above the chimneys to the very top of the tall cliff, where the old lighthouse stood watching over the village.

(personification)

Cohesion from one paragraph to the next

(noun phrase)

Inside the cold, stone walls of the lighthouse tower, John Hadley sat hunched at his wooden desk with only a single candle to light his work; the daily log of the ships that had passed by that day.

(:)
explanation of what the work is.